I had no plans to be in Iceland. I had no plans to be away from home on Dec 2, but the airlines had a different idea for me :)

I found myself on a 24-hour layover in Reykjavik due to a missed connection and having chatted with some nice folks from the Washington DC area, they graciously included me in their half day tour with Gunnar of Season Tours. I had no idea how lucky I was as we stepped out of the hotel at 9am in pitch darkness to meet him.

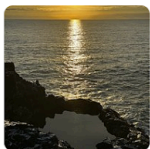

The next six hours were spent touring around the Reykjanes peninsula - the southwest portion of Iceland - which is home to both the capital city as well as Keflavik, the smaller suburb where the international airport is located. Gunnar is personable, knowledgeable and funny - we felt at ease immediately and able to converse with him about local culture, history and geology.

To say that Iceland is captivating is an understatement. We saw a small fraction of what the country has to offer but still were able to experience geothermal vents, incredible views of the low-hanging winter sun, a mesmerizing rocky shoreline with Eider birds, and the continental divide between North America and Europe. Every step was fascinating and well narrated by our host.

In between stops we stayed warm in his modern Mercedes van - a welcome break from the balmy 24F outdoor temperature :)

Wrapping up - I am grateful to Jon and Benthany who included me in their plans and of course to Gunnar for an amazing half a day. I can't wait to return and see more.
